disaffection between him and his subjects, has also unded to Europe, leaving the tonge to tomed to use, sometimes would not contain him; therefore his second request was, that whoever sat down in that chair should be deprived of the ability to raise without his leave. He then observed that he often lost small change from the pocket of the breethes which he usually wore, and desired that whatever he might put in that pocket could not get out until taken out by him. After granting these requests, the saint took his leave. At the end of the term agreed on, the Devil appeared and claimed the fulfilment of the contract. Jack professed his readiness to accompany him. But, said he, if am forging some training the sex are seldom seen, either walking or riding. They are generally locked up from first blow. It has beldam if I leave them unfinished—take the sledge and strike a few blows for me. The Devil complied, and Jack went off to the house. After a time he returned and found the old fellow still similting the anvil, blow after blow, without power to slack or dicon. There were more large ways as the second them. after blow, without power to slack or dicontinue his labours. He then offered to length en the lease of his life seven years more; on

Jack begged the privilege of changing his clothes, which was granted by his majesty.
Getting on his old breeches they started off in company. They had not travelled far be fore Jack said to his companion—1 am dry; and here is an old woman off my acquaintance who keeps whiskey: now you change yourself into a crown, and I will put you in my pucket, and we will go in and have some sport with the old woman. Being metamorsport with the old woman off my depth of the barbour, is hailed at Port Santa

Being inetamorphosed, Jack pocketed him and went along where some trip-hammers were at work, and desired the workmen to give his old breeches a hammering, as they were hard and stiff. They, willingly to enjoy a little sport, clap-ped the breeches under a hammer, which mak-ing the poor Devil's situation rather unplea-sant, caused himself to stir within the pocket. which, of course, gave to the breeches a strange and mysterious movement. Some of the workmen observed that the Devil was in the workmen observed that the Devi the breeches, and placed them under thehea-viest hammer. This soon caused the old fel-low to roar out: he offered as a ransom for his liberty, to cancel his claim on Jack, and relieved him forever, without any condition. Up-on these terms he was suffered to depart.

Although able to gull and cheat the Devil, death would not be denied. After a time he died. Having made his walk to the gates of died. Having made his walk to the gates of heaven, he requested admittance. His name being demanded, he responded Jack O'Lanthorn.' He was then informed that he must go where he had sold himself. He then started for another place, not exactly so agreeable; after gruping his way through darkness, thick fogs and mists, and overcoming many thick togs and mists, and overcoming many other obstacles, he reached the gate, and stormed away sharply for admittance. The Devil, after obtaining his identity, and telling him that he had found it to be for his interest to have as little to do with him as possible, ordered him off, but he relused to depart, unless they would furnish him with a torch to day for the Russian Ambassador, who died and pantalouns to match, also pussibly a Cassi enable him to see his way. THE INDIAN BRIDE. My dear Atterley, you little know the strength of Tle plate we have chosen for our present number, represents an imposing view of those great natural curiosities, the Rocky Mounas. The following story, the scene of which slaid partly in these romantic regions, will read with great interest. It forms a sufcient illustration of the engraving.

The funeral mounds, scattered over the fertile plains lying upon the tributaries of the Mississippi, that majestic parent of waters, have, for two centuries, attracted the eye of the solitary hunter, and awakened the sympathies of the humane and contemplative tra have settled the bears the name of that dark and angry flood, they are usually discovered upon the beautiful levels irrigated by streams, every where intersecting a region of undying verdure, exce the dominion and peaceful home of the free-born Indian. Now they exhibit no vestampli, at once the monuments of his power and instability. They are, nevertheless, the epulchres of brave, generous and gentle be-igs. The warrior lies here, whose daring leeds had struck dismay to the soul of the inhe impulse of a guileless bosom; the matron; whose native virtue and open handed hospitality cherished anfeeling men, who were ready, even at her fireside, for deeds of violehee and the innucent babe, who only a erted its eye from her bosom, to sport with he dizzling instrument of merciless slaugh-
